

Maggie Hassan

Maggie Hassan, a Senior Sponsored Research Administrator in the Office of Research Funding and Support, has been with Emory College of Arts and Sciences for just over two years. However, in that short space of time, she has put into place an entire system of support for faculty applying for research awards from sponsors external to Emory. Her efforts have contributed substantially to the extent that there has been an almost three-fold increase in the number of proposals submitted and research awards received by Emory College.

Her other numerous initiatives to provide better support for College faculty and staff have been received with pronounced enthusiasm by those she serves and have substantially increased the satisfaction of College faculty who apply for external grants.

One faculty member commented that Maggie “found ways to make things happen. She is very good at finding errors, and then takes the initiative to fix them. And when things get complex, she takes on the task of figuring out what needs to get done in order to protect our time. I really feel that she is trying to help me succeed. Finally, her calmness, optimism, and can-do spirit in the middle of stressful situations is always a comfort.”
